Poker tells are poker tells that can be spotted by poker players, poker tells are all in all most often overlooked by most poker players. A poker tell is a signal given by the player when he has a hand and he is unhappy with the outcome of the previous hand. This signal is like an unconscious cry or shout. A poker tell is a one time occurrence, so players who do not pay attention to such signals can end up losing big. A well thought out strategy requires a good understanding of the game. It is not often that we see a strategy or an approach that improves or helps all aspects of the game. Sure, you can look at some players and observe their behavior and make a judgment call on whether they are running a good or bad game or whether they have any tells. Sometimes, it is very difficult to distinguish between a play that works well for a good poker player and one that works for a bad player. For example, a player who is playing very slowly and with very little concentration is often a good poker player. If he suddenly wins a hand, it is very hard to distinguish whether he actually was playing poorly or if it was just bad luck. We can often see players who have a bad hand get all excited, stare down at the cards and finally fold after realizing that they were never going to win. The term "tell" is most often used to describe a poker tell, or a hand that has a few tells. A tells is a sign that is given to the player and it is usually unintentional. A tells can help you to know what hand is in the game and what the strength of that hand is. If you are able to read the tells then you can use this information to play the hand and win or to take a seat at the table. How do you spot a tells?
